First Generation Petabox - aka Red Rack

The first generation Petabox was designed and deployed in 2004. It was optimized for low power consumption and high storage density. It initially used 250GB hard drives and stored 80TB in a rack. An entire petabyte required 25 such racks.

Over its 6.5 year lifetime, storage densities increased to 80TB, 120TB, and finally 160TB per rack. These machines served as the primary storage for Internet Archive until their retirement in 2010.

THE GREAT 78 PROJECT

Microaudio CDs, kHz by about 160 reproduction rate. The concept that disks of music made at 78rpm.
They were mostly made from shellac, a brittle resin, and were the brittle precursors to the LP (microgroove) era.
The format is obsolete, and the surface noise is often unbearable. Just picking them up can break your heart as they break apart in your hands. So why does the Internet Archive have more than 200,000 in our physical possession?

For years the ARChive of Contemporary Music (ARC) had been getting calls offering 78rpm collections that they were unable to accept. But when Internet Archive and ARC partnered to focus on preserving and digitizing audio-visual materials, space and shipping became available and it was now possible to begin preserving 78s. Here's a short history of how in only a few years ARC and the Internet Archive have created one of the largest collections in America.

Our first major donation came from the Batavia Public Library in Illinois, part of the Barne H Thorpe Collection of 48,000 78s. For us this donation is a dream: it allows us to preserve material that was otherwise going to be thrown away, it has a larger cultural value beyond the music, and it contained a mountain of unfamiliar music, much of it quite rare.

Our second large donation prompted the Internet Archive to digitize all of our 78s.
The Joe Tenno Collection came to us through a cold call. The 10,000+ 78s were stored in a warehouse for more than 40 years, originally deposited by a distributor.

Over time more collections have been offered to us and we've accumulated 200,000 78s in our physical archive facility. The Great 78 Project is the beginning of our efforts to digitize these discs for preservation, research and discovery.

To date other major library collections donated so far include: Boston Public Library (50,000 78s), John Hopkins University (4,000 jazz 78s), Kansas State University (8,000 78s) and Connecticut College has linked their historic sheet music collection to the Great78Project.
